More than 20 public assembly meetings have been held in Sydney suburbs since the controversial power plant was mooted. According to a petition, about 35,000 people have signed up to oppose the project, while the same number support it. An anti-Adani meeting on social media Earlier this year The Telegraph Media reported that a group of Facebook users coordinated meetings in Sydney's north shore suburbs to sound the alarm on plans for the controversial power plant. Last week, local resident Cleve McCart reported that more than 20 public meetings have now been held in Sydney's south west, arguing that a toxic project that will damage the local environment is not worth the risk. "The meeting yesterday [Friday] was amazing with more than 40 people," he said. "It was announced beforehand at the South Guildford public hall. People from the two opposing sides came together and it was great to see people of all different beliefs." Mr McCart explained that if the Adani power plant is built, the local community will be subject to health issues due to increased dust and wastewater from the project, and that the local groundwater could be contaminated. "We need to get this thing to stop," he said. However, a group of residents in Sydney's north shore have taken to Facebook to announce another meeting next Saturday and invite anyone else " who has an interest in stopping the Adani mine and power plant". A group called 'Save Our Dapto' has claimed that Dapto is the "worst area" to build an Abbot Point coal terminal and power plant. "We won't be silenced," the group wrote. Sydney plans to join Australian Capital Territory The NSW government has committed to joining the ACT in its ACT-wide moratorium on all new fossil fuel projects. The move follows the ACT's confirmation in June of its moratorium on the Adani power project. "Today we met with our ACT Ministers, Public Safety Ministers and the Deputy Premier to reinforce our commitment to the ACT and to the ACT's 5.3 million people," said NSW Environment Minister Mark Speakman. "I am pleased that the Government has taken this action to ensure the NSW fossil fuel ban is

Q: Which of the two is shorter in code in this block? (update) From my previous question, I wrote a new version of this script. The codes are like this: var $element = $(this).attr("id"); var $this = $(this); var $list = $("#" + $element + "-list"); var $amount = $("#" + $element + "-amount"); var $items = $("#" + $element + "-items"); As you can see, there are 5 variables. Which would be better to use? Is it faster to use the var $this = $(this)? Is it better to use the var $element = $(this).attr("id"); instead of $(this).attr("id")? To my best understanding, var $this = $(this) is equal to $(this).attr("id") (except for the variable name.) Is it better to use the var $element = $(this).attr("id"); instead of $(this).attr("id")? A: It's
