A Free Speech Column Affirmative action has been with us for a long time, but the concept is almost as problematic as it is prevalent. Unlike race-based affirmative action, which is widely described as discriminatory or racist, many believe that affirmative action attempts to remedy the results of discrimination. This kind of affirmative action addresses the microaggression, rather than the macroaggression. Consider how affirmative action is applied. I believe that affirmative action should be viewed in the same way as sexual harassment, or eating at a fast food restaurant. The issue is the microaggression, not the macroaggression. For example, when someone eats at a fast food restaurant, it is considered inappropriate that other customers notice their order and make a comment. However, when somebody is dressed differently than you, the difference is not necessarily discrimination. How do we draw the distinction? People will say that the reason why minorities have been unable to rise to the top in America is because there is some special law or mandate that keeps them down. The truth is
